Learners with large vocabularies may have been able to generate more distinct. However, overgeneralization of these patterns within the novel language leads to a characteristic pattern of errors. Furthermore, similar to Finnemann individual learners tend to favor one preposition, with por being favored by less proficient learners.

Moreover, I investigated two methods of learning vocabulary in these second language learners. Higher level learners may be more effective guessers because they possess a larger lexicon, which in turn allows them to employ both bottom-up and top-down strategies.
