Our position is excellent this time, a high crest, with open lands sloping down. To get new straw we sometimes make a patrol in the night to the outskirts of a ruined village in front of our lines and take what we need from a deserted stable. Back to the trenches. Our company assembled this afternoon and we took a fine walk through the woods on the heights above Verzenay. The flight attendant says: I used to read you in the newspapers. The details of these subterranean quarters, completely hidden from the enemy, nothing prevents us from burning as many candles as we like. Some one strikes a match and tries to rekindle with straw from the floor the embers that smoulder here and there in holes picked out of the wall.
