Robin Cox has argued that the economic Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth argument can only be successfully rebutted on the assumption that a moneyless socialist economy was to a large extent spontaneously ordered via a self-regulating system of stock control which would enable decision-makers to allocate production goods on the basis of their relative scarcity using calculation in kind. The economic calculation problem is a criticism of using central economic planning as a substitute for market-based allocation of the factors of production. It is just that the study of values and interactions among individuals is beyond the scope of economics.

WearguethatMisesmakesnoclear distinctionbetweenthepraxeologicalcor There is no need for such an opinion. In their speaking and writing, Albert and Hahnel narrate this remarkable process to show how attractive and feasible their system would be. These studies consistently failed to support the neoclassical analysis: virtually all of them found that by standard neoclassical measures of efficiency, the planned economies performed as well or better than market economies.
