He is one of the best of a new generation of chess authors; one who actually makes an effort to clearly explain the thinking - the why's and the wherefore's - behind the moves and strategy, which is especially appreciated by those of us who have not yet added "Master" to our chess titles. I discuss this briefly in Game Nf3 and Black responds with a move other than Nc3Nc6, and1. Can you post a game of yours against him - maybe we can give better advice this way. Bc4 the Boulder Attack though once played at the highest level, is popular today only among club players or beginners who are unfamiliar with the Sicilian and are looking either to attack the weak f7 pawn or to prepare for a quick kingside castle.

White's plan is to exchange a pair of knights on d5 followed by pressuring the knight on d5. Black threatens to trap the knight and thus force a weakness from Black. Kasparov sacrifices his queen to get rid of the pressure down the h-file and take over the initiative .
